

The National Adoption Competency Mental Health Training Initiative (NTI) Pilot for Mental Health Professionals to Launch in March 2018

Press Release: January 10, 2018

Burtonsville MD - The National Adoption Competency Mental Health Training Initiative (NTI) is

National Adoption Competency Mental Health Training Initiative

announcing the availability of its free web-based, state-of-the-art, adoption competency mental health pilot training for mental health professionals to be launched in March 2018. This evidence-informed standardized curriculum is one of NTI's two adoption competency training curricula funded by the Children's Bureau and developed by the Center for Adoption Support and Education (C.A.S.E.) with the University of Maryland School of Social Work / Institute for Innovation and Implementation, PolicyWorks and several curricula developers.

The NTI training provides clinicians with a no-cost opportunity to become better equipped to address the mental health needs of children, youth, and families moving toward or having achieved permanency through adoption and guardianship. The training modules provide foundational knowledge, values, and skills for adoption-competent casework and clinical practice. The content addresses the core issues of adoption and guardianship with a focus on assessment, support, and therapeutic interventions to promote permanency and family stability.

The NTI curriculum for mental health professionals pilot training will be implemented in the pilot sites of California, Illinois, Maine, Minnesota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Washington, and The Cherokee Nation. This training developed for mental health professionals has followed the NTI curriculum for child welfare professionals which completed its pilot training in December 2017 with nearly 6000 pilot users enrolled and a completion rate of nearly 70%. The national launch of both curricula is planned for 2019, kicking off open access to the training post-pilot for the first time in all states, tribes, and territories.

Dawn Wilson, Director of NTI, addressed the intense need for this adoption competency training, "Because of traumatic life experiences and compromised beginnings, many children who are adopted or in guardianship experience elevated risks for developmental, health, emotional, and behavioral challenges." Research shows that the impact of these experiences and challenges often compromise well-being and family stability.

- Up to 80 percent of children in foster care have significant mental health issues, compared to approximately 18-22 percent of the general population.

National advisors have vetted the NTI competencies including clinicians, adoption researchers, child welfare administrators, and people with lived experience. Debbie Riley, LCMFT, CEO of C.A.S.E. added, “We believe NTI has the potential to continuously improve outcomes by infusing adoption mental health competencies into child welfare and mental health practice. I am excited and eager to advance the development of accessible adoption competency curriculums.” Debbie explains further in the video above.

“NTI offers an easy-to-use and comprehensive overview of the unique issues of children in adoption and foster care placement,” said NTI Advisor, David Brodzinsky, Developmental, Clinical, and Forensic Psychologist, Professor Emeritus of Clinical Psychology, Rutgers University. He continued, “Understanding adoption challenges and issues that can influence self-esteem, identity, family relationships and psychological adjustment is critical for mental health professionals to consider in their work with these individuals. The reality shared by many adoptive families is that therapists lacking adoption competence training can, at times, do more harm than good. I have found there is very little substantive training like NTI available today.”
